

HE COULD NOT TELL THE DIFFERENCE.

On visiting Mr. Grosse's museum of curiosities at La Chartre, in the South of France, I had occasion to see one of his more precious collections...

In this manner we went through four or five rooms successively, which were filled with curious objects, the majority of which had been procured from Mr. Grosse by one of his friends, a learned and brave sea-captain...

Nevertheless, owing to that fashionable cult, which nothing so vain as to look for the supply of places which still looked very well, when the sailor who served as the captain's valet...

The captain showed him the unfortunate trousers, which he had made for him before he was in the habit of wearing them.

"There!" said he, "just look! The very pair you were complimenting me on yesterday!"

"Well, you must have another pair made," he answered. "I will make a pair such as you wear."

"Certainly; to make another pair—some of your Chinese fellows?"

"Yes, and get a sack and so on, made in their regular style," continued the captain, laughing at his shoulders.

"They would make you a sack," said the other, "and if you only give them the model upon which you want them made, they will turn you out a pair of trousers that will make you know from his own."

"Indeed!" said the captain.

"Upon my honour," said the friend of the friend of the Chinese, "I have heard hundreds of times of the utility of the Chinese."

"And all that you have heard upon the subject has been less than the truth."

"Really, you make me think of trying them!"

"Do try, especially as it won't cost you much. I have made a pair for the trousers of a pair of friends."

"Well, you can see what they are capable of doing here for fifteen."

"And what tailor must I take them to?"

"The first you come to. I like, if you like, to live in the city."

"The friend translated the remark to the tailor, who looked at the trousers again, and said, 'Well, I think the captain is a few words in the way.'"

"The three days are not too long in order to do as he properly does."

"Well, three days then; but don't let him break his word."

"Oh, no, no, no, there is no fear. In three days, at the exact time, he'll be at your house."

"And the two friends went away, repeating their remarks to the artist, and a few words in the way."

"Well," said the captain, "I think the artist is a few words in the way."

"There they are," said the tailor.

"Let's try them," said the captain, as he took the trousers from the hands of the tailor, and put them on.

"I should think so," said the friend.

"Well, you can see they are very nice, and they give you my old ones. But where are the others, you say?" he asked the tailor.

"The friend translated the remark to the tailor, who gave the other pair with a triumphant look. The captain changed the trousers.

"Well, I must be mad!" said the captain.

"This pair seems to be mine. Where can the next one be?"

"The friend expressed the captain's doubt to the tailor who laid out the trousers on which he had just finished operating."

"Well, here is the new pair," said the friend.

"No! can't you see they are very nice, and they give you my old ones. But where are the others, you say?" he asked the tailor.

AN AMUSING BREACH OF PROMISE CASE.

In the Queen's Bench Division yesterday, before Baron Huddleston and a common jury, the case of Mr. Lyons in his pending statement. I know that I have been previously so classified, chiefly because I have thought it my duty, on more than one occasion, to attack popular pretensions. I have invariably done so, however, on public—never on merely literary—grounds. But to say that I do not honour or glorify every contemporary is quite another thing to saying that I have depreciated all. My error, indeed, has been, in certain cases, on the side of enthusiasm. As the defendant, I may mention the fact that I worked lonely twenty years ago to establish the literary reputation of Mr. Browning, and that I wrote the following letter, a letter that gentleman describing me as "the kindest critic he ever had."

THE LATE SIR THOMAS GLADSTONE.

The funeral of Sir Thomas Gladstone has been fixed to take place on Tuesday next. Mr. Gladstone will be present, but it is doubtful whether his medical advisers will allow of his attending the funeral, or trying to do so in the event of his attending the funeral, Mr. Gladstone would not leave London before Monday.

THE LATE CAPTAIN MAN.

By his will, dated June 29th, 1886, the late Captain Man, of Woodbridge, formerly of Philadelphia, and of the United States Navy, bequeaths £5,000 to his friend, Mr. Myles Fenton, born in 1828, the son of Myles and Elizabeth Fenton, of Kendal, Westmorland, now general manager of the South-Eastern Railway, £10,000 to John Green, of Woodbridge, £10,000 to Laura Louisa, daughter of Captain St. Jordan, and £5,000 to John Wood, of Philadelphia, who is also residuary legatee. The value of the personality in England is £13,291. 9s. 6d.

THE MISSING ACTRESS.

The report that Miss Mabel Love, the missing Gaiety actress, had been found in Dublin, was confirmed on Thursday night. She left London by the express on Saturday, and travelled thence by the Great Northern to Dublin, but the next morning she was found in the steamer Violet to Dublin. On arrival in the city on Sunday morning she put on a local branch of the insurance society, and left Tuesday evening, when she removed to private lodgings at 10, St. James's Street. On Monday evening she was without success, but on Tuesday she was found at the Gaiety Theatre here, for employment. She had been in London for some time, but her identity, and Superintendent Reddy, of the Dublin police, visited her. On being addressed this she replied that she was Miss Mabel Love, and went back to London this morning. She complained that her mother had spoken harshly to her, and that she had been obliged to leave home. She left Dublin on her return to London this morning by the steamer Shark.

INSURING CHILDREN'S LIVES.

The arguments in favour of some change in the law regarding the insurance of children have derived additional force from the case that is now under investigation in the police-court at Chester. A local branch of the insurance society, which is charged with the terrible crime of successively poisoning the lives of her children, age respectively two, four, and six years, has yet to put upon her own and such a list of cases as to show that she is not a person of ordinary prudence. The lives of these poor children were insured in a local branch of the insurance society, and although a medical man was found in each instance to certify that the child had died from natural causes, the post-mortem examination of the only one whose remains were not too decayed to be subjected to any examination, exhibited symptoms suggesting opium poisoning. Both children, we may observe, died within one month of the date of their respective deaths. These things are regarded as a matter of course that the insurance company actually circulated, and an advertisement in the local press, in which a letter signed by the father returning his sincere thanks for the public interest in the case, and the death of my son, who had been a member only six months. This precautionary document concludes with the sinister comment—"An office like yours, that gives immediate full benefits, deserves to be more widely known, when it is sure to be appreciated." We have already urged that such a public notice, however, should be demanded that no parent shall be permitted to derive a profit from the death of a child. The common plea of general expediency, which in the case of children of persons in the station of life of most of this class of insurers is a rule not more than a fourth of such a sum as 10s. 6d. presents no practical difficulty; for nothing would be easier than to permit the insuring company to undertake the funeral in a style proportioned to the premiums, while strictly forbidding it to hand over a single shilling to parents or friends who had not a corresponding bona fide interest in the life of the deceased.
